

the world is being built up by greedy people wanting higher towers and then there's a war or a hurricane or a tsunami or a virus or a financial collapse happening

to put things in balance.

this has happened all through history and the humankind survives and moves on.

this is not an exception: this is a rule.

and you are not granted to stay here, that is not your right. you were handed a gift of walking here for a little while, breathing the air, feeling things, but did you say thank you? ever? or just took for granted, carried life like a burden and now you're being angry because suddenly things outside of your control are threatening your peace?

why do you let your peace depend on things outside of your control in the first place?
